An industry-backed activist group's attempt to censor global warming information has failed. CEI (Competitive Enterprise Institute) dropped its merit-less lawsuit, which sought to delete the 2000 National Assessment of Climate Change Impacts on the United States from government websites. The lawsuit was dropped with prejudice, meaning that CEI can not re-file it.

In a side agreement with CEI, the government has agreed to add text to the website hosting the National Assessment which states that it was <sup>3</sup>not subjected to OSTP's Information Quality Act Guidelines.<sup>2</sup> Today, 31 scientists and analysts from the National Assessment Synthesis Team sent a letter to the Department of Commerce and NOAA stating that this statement is <sup>3</sup>misleading and incorrect,<sup>2</sup> because the report was prepared before the guidelines existed and because it underwent extensive peer review that would have passed muster under the guidelines had they been in place.

Statement by Daniel Lashof:

<sup>3</sup>CEI claiming victory in this lawsuit is like the Red Sox saying they won the World Series. The National Assessment shows that global warming is a serious threat to our health, our economy and our environment. It went through every step of peer review, involving hundreds of technical experts, and is accepted as authoritative by mainstream scientists.

<sup>3</sup>The disclaimer<sup>1</sup> cited by CEI as a victory applies equally well to the Bible, the Declaration of Independence and the Surgeon Generals Report on smoking.<sup>2</sup>
